Article Published in AgingToday on Emergency Preparedness

Consumer Voice Executive Director Lori Smetanka and former Ohio State Long-Term Care Ombudsman Beverley Laubert have published an article on emergency preparedness in the American Society on Aging’s newspaper, AgingToday. Long-term care facilities are required by law to have plans for emergency procedures. However, in the past, regulations were not clear on what details needed to be included in the plans, and recent natural disasters have revealed that many long-term care facilities and community care systems are unprepared to handle emergencies and protect their residents and patients.

In the wake of Hurricane Katrina when 215 nursing home residents and hospital patients died because of plan failures, the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services (CMS) developed resources and guidance on emergency preparedness. Yet, despite the efforts of CMS and at state and local levels, problems persisted in nursing homes.

In 2016, CMS wrote more comprehensive rules around emergency preparedness including requiring 17 different provider types, including nursing facilities, to have an emergency preparedness program that meets all federal, state and local requirements and to develop policies and procedures based on the emergency plan; to require training and to test the plans; and to mandate standby power systems. For the rules to be effective, there must be sufficient implementation, monitoring and enforcement. Residents and families should ask about the emergency plan and know what it entails. Long-term care ombudsmen can assist during emergency situations by focusing on the individual residents. They can help with locating lost personal items, checking in with residents who require relocating, and advocating for quality care.

Continued Advocacy Needed for Money Follows the Person Program

We want to thank everyone who reached out to their Senators to co-sponsor the EMPOWER Care Act which would continue the Money Follows the Person program (MFP). Unfortunately, the MFP program was not included in the federal budget deal that was passed last week. However, Congress can still continue funding for the MFP program by including it in the March 23 Omnibus Spending Bill.

The need to extend the MFP program is urgent. CMS has issued a document showing that a number of states have already stopped transitioning individuals back into the community, and others will stop doing so sometime this year. We urge everyone to let their Senators know how vital the MFP program is for long-term care consumers – and mark your calendars for more advocacy action during the week of March 5.

Video Series on People with Disabilities’ Experience with the Healthcare System
The Colorado Department of Health Care Policy and Financing has produced a series of videos that show how people with disabilities experience the healthcare system. The video series offers ways for providers to be more prepared in their interactions with people with disabilities while promoting compassion and understanding for everyone. Topics in the series include: the healthcare experience for people with disabilities; what is disability competent care?; core values of disability competent care; and disability competence in communication access, programmatic access and physical access.
